New Colorado rules not curbing growth of medical-marijuana industry

As Colorado's new tougher regulations on the medical marijuana business take hold — rules its sponsors predicted would curb sales — the industry is showing remarkable resilience.

The state Department of Revenue is preparing to issue its first dispensary licenses and to aggressively enforce the new regulations.

Still, of the 818 dispensaries that originally applied for licenses in August, 759 have managed to navigate the rules and remain on track to receive one. That is a drop-off of about 7 percent.

If there is a pot bubble in Colorado, it hasn't popped yet.

When the bill creating the new rules was passed by the legislature last year, one of the sponsors, then-state Sen. Chris Romer, predicted it would "close down as much as 50 percent of the existing retail structure."

That doesn't appear to have happened yet due to a combination of a product "that so many need" and the industry's ability to cope with the changing rules, said Aaron Smith, executive director of the National Cannabis Industry Association, a trade group.

"There will be probably some fallout, but I think this industry is pretty well grounded," Smith said.

Romer, a Denver Democrat, and co-sponsor Rep. Tom Massey, a Poncha Springs Republican, say dispensary numbers are likely to shrink after July 1, the date when Revenue Department auditors begin actively checking on compliance.

"My priority was responsible regulation, so I'm pleased that the initial phase has worked to ensure compliance with the law," Romer, who is running for Denver mayor, said in a statement. "As we move into full implementation, I expect we'll see additional dispensaries that don't meet the strict state regulations closed."

Dispensary license application fees run between $7,500 and $18,000. The mandated security systems and other items run thousands more.

Faced with such bills, some dispensary owners have called it quits — by selling to dispensaries looking to expand.

"At some point, there's got to be competition in the market that's going to eliminate some of the centers that are less viable," Massey said.

Ryan Cook, a co-owner of The Clinic in Denver, said his business plans to double its number of locations to four.

The Clinic is also looking at opening another location outside Denver.

Facing a statewide moratorium on opening new dispensaries, the only way to expand is by purchasing a dispensary that is already in the license-application queue, Cook said.

"We're not going to see a huge reduction in the number of dispensaries, probably just a reduction in the number of different names we see," Cook said.

So far, eight dispensaries have been denied licenses for failing to show they are growing 70 percent of the marijuana they sell, said Julie Postlethwait, a spokeswoman for the Revenue Department's Medical Marijuana Enforcement Division.

Other dispensaries have withdrawn their applications, including several that are in areas that have recently banned marijuana businesses.

After July 1, when a number of new rules officially take effect, the division will also begin denying licenses for more reasons, such as an owner failing to pass a background check.

So, are you people willing to let this state get cuts on federal funding just so you can smoke? By the way, smoking causes cancer, or did you not get the message? Does not matter what type of smoke is inhaled into your already filthy lungs, it can kill you. Then, I suppose your families will want to sue the government? You people are going down a road that leads to nowhere. This is not just about medical use and you all know it.

vaporizing doesn't cause cancer-brownies don't either-time to brush up on the latest trends in consumption.

Sir, you are no conservative, you are a big government shill. Smaller, less obtrusive government is the key, along with personal responsibility. Put your "reefer madness" mentality away with the other fairy tales used to frighten little children. And for your edification, the hippie movement died in the 70's. Get a life!

Thankfully, the antiquated walls of Prohibition are rapidly falling. This industry is growing everyday, not just in Colorado, but across the country. It's hard for some to accept, but about half of the country is ready for change... remove the Bible Belt from the equation and it's no contest. There are over 1 million patients registered nationwide, Colorado has 140,000.... it's not just here, Arizona received over 4,000 applications in the first month of its program in April and their app. process is online only!

I highly doubt the percent of people smoking pot has gone up much. I know studies have shown in other places people who want it obtain it, and people who don't want it don't buy it and the legal status matters little.

The only difference is you wish to spend tax dollar arresting the pot smokers you so detest, while I wish to save that money plus get taxes revenue that comes with legalization.

Plenty of pot smokers by the way are full time workers with families. They have a life, but I guess a "life" only counts if approved by you.

Such BS. Lets get done with it and legalize pot, but with heavy regs (esp. no imports or exports; no using of un-stamped pot).

Lots of people use Vaporizers to avoid the smoking aspect. You sir, are a closed-minded bigot. Which federal funding has been cut? If you don't need the MMJ, don't use it. If people do need it, they should be able to use it (in proper environments). Get a clue and join the 21st century. You jumped to so many conclusions that your legs must be tired. It is pretty rare for politicians to overtly try to shut a legal industry down, but that is what they try to do secretly every day.

Politicians constantly regulate, contain, and kill industries to help their friends and donors. This outrage is nothing new.

I live within walking distance of about six pot shops, and there is no trouble at all. It is a big source of nothing.
